TODAY IN HISTORY WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 21.

The Maiming of Sir John Coventry. The Maiming of Sir John Coventry.

A strange scene was enacted in London on the night of December 21, 1659. Near Suffolk street were assembled fifteen or twenty of his majesty's guards, mounted and unmounted, under the command of Sir Thomas Sands and the son of the Earl of Incliquin. From 19 e'clock to 2 they waited impatiently for the coming of Sir John Coventry, whom they expected to passe on his way home from the tayern at which he supped. At length he came, and, divining their hostile purpose at a glance. Sir John snatched a flambeau from his servant, and, drawing his sword, placed his back against the wall and bravely defended, himself with both weapons. He succeeded in dashing O Brien and some others of his agailants. record detended in mosely with both venpoins. He succeeded in dashing PBrien and some others of his assailants of the ground, but was forced to succumb of superior numbers. to the ground, but was forced to succumb to superior numbers. After they had disarmed him, the cowardly crew threw him down and, cutting his nose to the bone, left him.

This atrocious set was perpetrated in accordance with the orders of the duke of Monmouth. Coventry's professed friend: but the actual instigator was Charles II, himself. In a parliamentary committee of ways and means, a motion had been made: "That toward the supply every one that resorts to any of the play houses, who sits in the boxes, shall pay one shilling; every one who sits in the plt shall pay say pence, and every other person three pence."

This was opposed by the court party on the ground that the players were the king's servants and a part of his pleasure. Whereupon Sir John Coventry pertinently, but indiscreetly, asked: "Whether the king's pleasure lay among the men or the women that acted?"

This was loueling Old Rowley too near to be pleasura, and it did not seed outch argument to persuade Charles that if the offense was allowed to plass in punished reflections on royal weaknesses would become dangerously common. And so the king, forgetful of obligations incurred by the fuglitive Charles Stuart, determined to make an example of Coventry, and carried out his resolve despite the remonstrances of his brother.

Parliament was furious at the indignity offered to one of its members on the very night after its adjournment, and made it the first subject for consideration upon measurabiling. The result of its deliberation was the passing of an act banishing the principal actors in the affair, with a special clause rendering them incagable of acceiving the principal actors in the affair, with a special clause rendering them incagable of processing the principal actors in the affair, with a special clause rendering them incagable of horizon and punishable by death. The Coventry act, as it was called, remained on the statule books till the year IN28, when it was repealed.

It is a curious discrementand that if any of his actors "did offer anyth
